SAXON SHIPS. The Saxons were primarily traders and as such first came to our shores. As seen from the old illuminated manuscripts, they also used a double-ended boat. They do not appear to have used oars but to have relied on sail for propulsion, with a broad bladed paddle for steering. Note the decorative figurehead and tail!

BAYEUX TAPESTRY. In the illustration of Harold landing in Normandy on his visit to William there is little change in the design of the boat. Note the "look-out" clinging precariously to the mast head, and the row of shields along the sides, denoting a ship of war. The sail is evidently controlled by the steersman, while the anchor is dropped from the bow of the boat.

13TH CENTURY. By this time there were temporary "castles" battlemented and erected at each end of the ship. They were built for the protection of the soldiers who were to leap down on to the enemy ships in hand to hand fighting. Lacking the battering rams of the Greeks and Romans this was the only possible method of attack. They were still steered by paddles.

15TH CENTURY. The clumsy steering paddle gave place to the rudder and there were three masts and sometimes a bowsprit. "Castles" were more developed and a crow's nest for the lookout added. Some provision was made for passengers and a very elementary compass simplified navigation by the aid of a "needle" and the pole star." In this century Christopher Columbus made his voyage of discovery to America in the Santa Maria.

16TH CENTURY. The Henry Grace a Dies, built as a warship with 150 guns, at the beginning of this century, had four masts and top gallant sails. The Elizabethan galleons which defeated the Spanish Armada were of this type, with greatly improved hulls and less cumbersome forecastle and stern. The sailors now slept in hammocks instead of on the floor in any odd corners.
