16TH CENTURY. The Henry Grace a Dies, built as a warship with 150 guns, at the beginning of this century, had four masts and top gallant sails. The Elizabethan galleons which defeated the Spanish Armada were of this type, with greatly improved hulls and less cumbersome forecastle and stern. The sailors now slept in hammocks instead of on the floor in any odd corners.

17TH CENTURY. During this century the gilding and decorating of ships was greatly developed. The Sovereign of the Seas, built at the command of Charles II in 1637 was a three decker, the first in the English Navy. Dutch ships of this time were built with two decks only, owing to the shallowness of their rivers and harbours.

18TH AND 19TH CENTURIES.
The latter part of the 18th and early part of the 19th century saw the sailing vessel reach its greatest development, from Nelson's Victory and the ships that won the Battle of Trafalgar, to the East Indiamen and the Clippers of the China Tea Trade, which accomplished the journey to London in 99 days. (Just before the last war the Hertzogen Cecilie took 78 days on the outward journey).

FIGUREHEADS. Most probably the earliest Figureheads were carved on the bows of ships to propitiate the gods, while the dragons warded off the evil pirits. The ships of Ancient Greece and Rome had figureheads, and until the 13th century "Castles" obscured them, so also had the English ships. With the development of the forecastle and the bowsprit the Figurehead returned.

STEAM BOATS. In 1788 an Edinburgh Banker owned a pleasure boat propelled by steam driven paddles, with both paddles and engine on deck—the boiler being beneath the deck of the very small boat—with sail in case of a breakdown. The Comet was the first steamship to run on a regular route in 1812, at the mouth of the Clyde. It was not until the 1830's that steam was used to cross the Atlantic.
