THE JUNK. The Junk is used all over the China Seas, from the river boat with one mast, which is usually the home of the family, its stern overhanging the water to facilitate dragging in the nets, to the big sea-going Pirate, one of the most sea-worthy vessels in the world.
They are built high at the stern and flat bottomed, and have one, two or three masts and matting sails stiffened with battens.

BALSA BOATS. These curious little boats of South America are made of Balsa wood, which is much lighter than cork. They have sails of reed matting and a double mast lashed to the sides of the boat and joined at the top. The steering paddle is held in place by the boatman's leg! They are used on Lake Titicaca, high up in the Andes, and have changed little since the days of the Incas.

CATAMARAN. The South American Catamaran is made up of logs pinned together with wooden pins, the outer logs up-tilted. It is keelless and is dragged to the water's edge on rollers. When afloat it is always awash. The steersman sits on a seat of crossed wooden struts and manages the sail while he steers with the paddle. It is also found in Southern India in a more primitive form.

GUATEMALA. The dugout illustrated is to be found high up in the mountainous regions of Central America. High side-boards guard against the heavy seas caused by storms on these lakes. They are crudely carved at the prows and there is little change in the shape and construction since the Spanish Conquerors came in the 16th century. They are propelled by paddles with long blades like cricket bats.
